

Upward movements signal either an expanding money supply (and bank reserves) or some combination of an expanding money supply and lower interest rates. The opposite also applies. Upward movements are in general favourable for many asset prices (especially stock prices) while downward movements are unfavourable.

